

Last Lecture

Last Lecture is a super engaging and fun to watch video by Randy Pausch. He was using relevant media like Star Trek and Charlie and the Chocolate Factory as examples and stepping stones to build to a point he's making. There is a specific part of the lecture that stuck with me the most, when talking about his experience with people in administration. Two people said the same thing to him, "I don't know," but one was angry and short while the other was gentle and considerate. Randy says "They're both ways of saying I don't know, but boy, there's a good way and a bad way." I think one of his biggest messages throughout the lecture is to not lose the child inside of you, and I can strongly relate to that. I really enjoyed watching this lecture from Pausch!

Learning Styles

Learning styles have been something I have always heard in school. It was usually visual, hands on, or auditory learning that was discussed. This is a helpful way to have people try to better understand their learning style, and I think it's beneficial! I do think they affect how we learn, especially if someone is being forced to learn in a way that's different from how they feel comfortable learning. However, learning styles can be learned themselves, I think so anyways, and being exposed to more can help someone know for certain how they want to learn.
